Exogenous and spontaneous APA expression: nuclear and cytoplasmic localization in cultured fibroblasts. We showed previously that in cultured fibroblasts, (pro)renin is secreted and then re-internalized by endocytosis, in a process dependent on dynamin, and contributes to an increase in cGMP synthesis. The mechanisms involved are unclear. In this work, we examined the localization of (pro)renin and APA in cultured mouse and human fibroblasts and compared the distribution of both secreted and cellular (pro)renin with that of APA. Renin expression was induced with interleukin-1beta and TNFalpha. APA was identified with anti-APA antibodies. We showed that both (pro)renin and APA were secreted into the culture medium, as previously reported. They were mainly localized in the cytoplasm in mouse and human fibroblasts. However, in addition, a part of (pro)renin was detected in the nucleus and APA in the cytoplasm. Moreover, these subcellular localizations varied in different fibroblast types. This could represent the migration of APA into the cytoplasm and nucleus depending on the number and type of APA receptors. Modification of a CAVER electronic video recording system for use in mild closed head injury. A CAVER electronic video recording system was modified to provide more flexibility in recording, allowing for an optimal recording of mild closed head injury. The original CAVER (Zickler, M. (1994). Neurologic Clinics 8:545-554) used a VHS-type video recorder. This presented a number of difficulties for recording episodes. In this study, we modified the system by using a VHS-type video recorder and a TV-type monitor. The video system offers: ease of use; recording capability; precise time information; and compatibility with a VCR. The increased capability allows the recording and storage of longer video sequences, and collection of time-series data. The modified CAVER system is easy to use, requiring only the use of a VCR, and no additional video recording equipment. The system can be operated in a unilateral modality, but in this mode requires the use of a TV monitor. The system allows for the spontaneous execution of a number of experimental tasks by an individual. This allows the collection of time series data for the purpose of event-related or block
